Field of the Invention This invention pertains to processes for fabricating structures for mass spectrometry in general, and to the fabrication of such structures in particular, which are useful in various methods of extracting ions from a gaseous sample, including ion mobility spectrometry and gas chromatography-mass spectrometry. 2. Description of the Prior Art At present, mass spectrometry is commonly used to determine chemical composition and molecular structure. A variety of different mass spectrometry techniques is presently available. Most of these methods involve ionization of the analyte molecules in a gaseous medium by the application of electrical or thermal energy, followed by an excitation process which results in the production of ions from the ionizable analyte molecules. Ions are then separated according to their mass-to-charge ratio, and the ionic species so produced detected. One of the important features of the present invention is the ability to discriminate between analyte

molecules in a mixture based on their structural composition, by means of mass spectrometric
